Editorial Review

From School Library Journal

PreS—Carluccio tracks the ambient sounds in a baby's world from morning to night. Beginning "When the sun comes up, the birds start to sing," the rhyming text follows the youngster through his day. Vibrant painted-paper collages are sprinkled with labels identifying the sounds in each setting. For example, "tweet, tweet" is next to the bird outside the window; "swish, swish" appears as the child swings in the park; and "clank, clank" by the cement mixer on the street. Striped and polka-dotted buildings, sidewalks patterned with scraps of newspaper, and a taxi roof cut from what looks like a phone book all combine to make a stimulating, noisy environment for this simple story. Endpapers are filled with childlike drawings of things that create sound (cat, bee, fish, bells, bird, car, phone, tea kettle, etc.), providing another opportunity for toddlers to identify. This book is a fine choice for a lap-sit or a bedtime story.—Mary Hazelton, Elementary Schools in Warren & Waldoboro, ME

A very simple rhyme and exuberant collage illustrations celebrate the diversity of people, animals, and vehicles in this highly interactive book. As a mom pushes her toddler in his stroller along the city streets, there's music and sound all around. It's made by instruments and also by the mix of languages everywhere (ciao!, hola!, bonjour!). Birds hoot and chirp; cars, trucks, and trains vroom. Even at home there's sound: the purr, purr of the kitten and the gentle pop, pop of bubbles as Daddy gives the child a bath. Little ones will point at objects in the pictures, make the sounds, and want to hear the words over and over again. --Hazel Rochman

Sounds are all around us. Have you ever shut your eyes and listened? Can you separate and identify what the sounds are? Readers will delight in following one baby through his day in the city. This is a charming book for little ones. The sounds will capture and keep your young child's attention. Pre-school teachers could really have some fun with this one. The colorful applique-style pictures add wonderment and fascination to a story that is sure to be a favorite. This reviewer highly recommends Barefoot Books. --The Picket News
